Southaven Park, north of the Long Island Expressway, are some of the remains what was once known as Millville. Some of the buildings still stand although the mills built by the Homan family and later owned by the Gerards are long gone.

Mordecai Homan built a saw mill, a grist mill and a fulling mill (for shrinking and thickening wool) just north of the “goin’ over” -- the ford about where Montauk Highway is now. These mills changed hands several times coming back to other Homans and then to Samuel Carman who married into the Homan family. Samuel Carman, Jr. ran a tavern in part of his large house which, in the early 19th century, was a stage stop on the route from Brooklyn to Easthampton. The South Haven or Carman’s Mills operated until Today, people hike and canoe along the river, picnic and camp, hunt and fish, ride horses on upland trails and row boats in the mill pond. Now that Southaven is a county park all Suffolk residents can respond to the lure of the river and enjoy the uplands and wetlands of its 1320 acres.

The large trout in the Carman’s River were a draw for some notable fisherman. In 1827 Daniel Webster rented some land above the South Haven mill pond with fishing rights for himself and a few friends, including Martin Van Buren, later the 8th president. This was the forerunner of the Suffolk Club organized by August Belmont in 1858. The Suffolk Club bought a 1500 acre shooting and fishing preserve and raised trout to stock the river. Theodore Roosevelt was one of the Club’s most famous members. Finally, Anson Hard bought up all the other shares and used the area as a private hunting preserve, raising pheasants and keeping a herd of European Sikka deer.

“Along the Carman’s River”

Beginning as a small stream in Middle Island, the Carman’s River flows southward to the eastern end of the Great South Bay.

This river, once known as the Connecticut River, winds through the Pitch Pine - Oak woodlands of central Suffolk, yet the vegetation in the wetlands along its banks is different from the open Pine Barrens of the upland areas. Red Maples grow in moister places closer to the river and the thick shrub layer

Evidence indicates that native Americans camped and hunted in this area. Later, the shape of the river itself was changed as people settled at several points along its course.

In the mid 1700’s dams were built in three places and mills constructed below the mill ponds. Upper Lake and Lower Lake in Yaphank are mill ponds as is Hard’s Lake further south. In the northernmost section of Canoeists along the Carman’s River often pass through Southaven Park, however all canoeists must check in at rowboat area before launching. Rowboats can be rented at the park for those who want to relax on the waters of Hard’s lake.

Fishing and Hunting

Freshwater fishing for trout, bass and perch is available along the Carman’s River, in the lake and the pond. A New York State fishing license is required and all persons must register at the Boat House. Waterfowl hunters may use sites along the east side of the river in season.

Horseback Riding

Bring your own horse and enjoy the trails that meander through the park, permit required.

Birdwatching

Southaven Park is a popular spot for birdwatching, especially in the winter because of the abundant waterfowl.

Well-known Figures Along the Carmar's River

In late 1780 Benjamin Tallmadge told General George Washington that he would like to cross the Long Island Sound from Connecticut to destroy a British supply collection point at Coram and while on Long Island raid the British occupied Fort St. George (St. George's Manor). Tallmadge and his company of 80 men landed at what is now Mt. Sinai and marched south along the east side of the Carmar's River to St. George's Manor where they captured 54 prisoners. While most of the company marched the prisoners back to their boats, Tallmadge took a small group to Coram to destroy the British supplies.

Daniel Webster occasionally came to fish in the Carmar's River. One well-known tale has it that in the spring of 1827 Webster was staying at Carmar's tavern in South Haven and attended the Sunday morning service across the street in the South Haven Presbyterian Churches. During Rev. Ezra King's sermon, Carmar's boatman slipped into the church and whispered to Carmar and Webster who promptly tiptoed out. Knowing what was up, other worshippers began to get up and leave. Finally, the Rev. Ezra King, himself an ardent fisherman, stopped preaching, pronounced the benediction and went off to the river with the others to watch Webster bring in his long sought quarry -- a 14 1/2 pound trout. The outline of the fish was traced on Carmar's tavern and the next day the shape (but 1/3 larger) was transferred to wood and cut out to create a weathervane for the church. Webster was so pleased with his visit that shortly thereafter he rented land along the Carmar's River.

SOUTHAVEN PARK

Along the River

Just a few yards away from the river sandy trails pass through low huckleberries and thin pines. But that narrow band along the river is quite a different world.

The moist soil supports several shrubs that have sweetly fragrant flowers in the spring and summer. Soft green mosses grow at the base of trees that lean out over the water. In early autumn the leaves on the trees lining the river banks begin turning bright red.

A curious clapping noise over the river turns out to be a swan's wings hitting the water as it takes off. Further upstream even a quiet approach to the river's edge may cause a series of "plops" as frogs or turtles jump into the water.

In quiet spots along the river bank circles that look like rain drops hitting the water are actually caused by water striders -- insects -- skating on the surface. Their dark bodies and long legs are nearly invisible against the shady, dark water. A flash of sunlight illuminates little golden-brown dragonflies cruising low over the water in search of mosquitoes to eat.

The river's edge is a narrow strip with some of Long Island's most exciting sensory experiences.
